問題 1 次の英文の要約を 200 字以内の日本語で書きなさい。

After the end of the pandemic, tourism in Japan has seen a rapid recovery. However, this comeback has reignited concerns about "overtourism," where the surge in visitors threatens the daily lives of local residents. While tourism revenue is a vital engine for regional economies, the costs to local communities—ranging from severe public transportation congestion to inappropriate visitor behavior—have become impossible to ignore.

In historic cities like Kyoto, buses once used primarily by residents are now so packed with tourists and their large luggage that locals find it difficult to commute to work or school. Similar issues are arising in rural areas where the infrastructure was never designed to handle massive crowds. The "tourist pollution" also includes problems like noise in residential areas, littering, and trespassing on private property for the perfect photo.

For a long time, the focus of the central and local governments has been on increasing the number of inbound visitors. Success was measured by quantitative milestones, such as reaching 40 million tourists annually. But this approach is no longer sustainable. If the quality of life for residents is degraded, the very charm of the region that attracts tourists will eventually be lost.

To address this, the government has recently begun implementing measures to disperse tourists. One strategy is to encourage travel to lesser-known rural regions, thereby reducing the pressure on "golden route" cities. Another is to introduce congestion-based pricing, such as higher fares for buses during peak hours or entry fees for specific historic districts.

However, technical solutions alone are insufficient. What is required is a fundamental shift in the mindset of "regional management." Local governments must prioritize the well-being of their citizens above short-term economic gains. They should listen carefully to resident complaints and use tourism taxes to directly improve local infrastructure that benefits everyone.

Sustainable tourism can only be achieved when there is a healthy balance between the needs of visitors and the rights of those who live there. It is the responsibility of the authorities to ensure that tourism serves as a force for community enhancement rather than a source of local resentment.
